FOR COUNTY BILL ACTION

House in Humor to Take Up Measure.

Prospects Are for Many Changes During Consideration.

Senate Committee Will Take Up Agricultural Affairs and Will Hear Many Opinions.

When the House meets this morning, if something is not done very speedily in relation to the county bill all kinds of sensations are promised. It is confidently expected, however, that the bill, which has been printed for three or four days, but not yet reported or laid on the desks of members, will be brought out and, under the rule, made the continuing order until finished.

It was reported yesterday that the holding back of the measure had given time for the preparation of the Home Rule bill and that it will be laid on the desks of members simultaneously, which is taken to mean that there will be a great many amendments offered.

SIBERIA EARLY

Friends of Captain Tremaine Smith of the Siberia have received letters from him in recent mails which lead them to believe he will bring his vessel into port this morning. The fact that R. P. Schwerin attributed the failure of the Korea to arrive here in four days and sixteen hours to bad coal and head winds would indicate that the Siberia will have better coal, and if the vessel meets with good weather it is believed that Captain Smith will push the vessel to beat the Korea's time.

to the Republican measure in the shape of motions to substitute Home Rule bill clauses.

While the county bill committee of the Senate has asked for more time, there is a belief that its report will be forthcoming much earlier and that simultaneous action may be had on the measure. Speaker Beckley has the power by special resolution to appoint a conference committee, and it is expected that the two houses will work in some sort of harmony.

One of the most important things to be done today is the meeting of the Senate committee on agriculture this afternoon, at which time representatives of the commercial bodies will be present and a general discussion as to the Department of Agriculture will be had. Mr. Smith, head of the United States Experiment Station, returned from Maui yesterday that he might be present at the meeting, and it is probable that the result of the conference will be highly important as bearing upon the action of the Legislature as regards the appropriation for Agricultural and forestry work.

The return of Superintendent Cooper will give the Chinese Fund committee an opportunity to obtain his testimony and close up its investigations with rapidity.

I am very thankful to those who have helped us in any way. We will need some money for March. Those who have it will please send, and it will be thankfully received. We now have just fifty children. All are well and happy, and have improved very much in every way since coming here.

LIEUT. NEWTON'S LECTURE TONIGHT

Lieutenant Harry Newton, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., of Camp McKinley, one of the officers who accompanied General Funston when Aguinaldo was captured in a bold dash for the Filipino chieftain's headquarters in Luzon, will give an address this evening at the Y. M. C. A. hall, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A., and he will tell how Aguinaldo was captured on that historic occasion. This will be the first time that Lieutenant Newton's story has ever been told in public in Honolulu, and as the incident is still fresh the address will be well worth hearing. For his participation in the expedition, Lieutenant Newton was rewarded by being promoted to the regular army, having formerly been a volunteer officer. Lieutenant Newton's address is the first of a series of three lectures, the other two to be given by Hon. W. N. Armstrong, who will tell of Kalakaua's trip around the world, and by Walter G. Smith, who will narrate his experiences as a war correspondent in the Japan-China War of 1894-95. Season tickets sell for $1 each, and the proceeds are to be divided equally between the two associations at Wailuku.

FUNERAL IMPRESSES OBSERVER

By Sol. N. Sheridan.

It was weather for the funeral of a king. That is the old Hawaiian of it. It was weather to make a white man's holiday. That is the nineteenth century Americanism of it. Just overcast a trifle, making a good light for kodak pictures, and with a spit of rain falling now and again, but not enough to hurt the whitest of white clothes. But you felt that a tropical storm was brooding in the air, and that it might break upon the city at any moment.

And under the clouds, through the threat of the tropical storm, past the Americans perched with their kodaks upon the points of vantage along the way, defied the slow length of the funeral train of one of the Polynesian blood royal.

It was a strange sight, a sight a bit anachronistic. Perhaps it was a sight in its solemn mingling of the mourning trappings of the Anglo-Saxon and of the dark islander that can be seen, today, nowhere outside of Honolulu. It may never, even, be seen here again. For the man that had passed was the last of the heirs of the Kamehamehas, it is told, and that was the real old royal line.

Americans are not much accustomed to state funerals. The American life is too vivid to permit of the putting on by the whole nation, at one time, of the trappings of woe. And America is too big. There are too many who will laugh as the dead go by—for America is likewise young, and irreverent. A state funeral where the police come by, as always, first, and then a brass band and soldiers is still a sight that most of us have seen. But where, leading the soldiers, a lot of women also come by in deepest black, women who mourn thus because they were and are of the highest that a decadent people, could show in its prime, surely that is a sight such as can be seen nowhere else on the globe today. And a state funeral where the catafalque is drawn by a long double file of young men, dark young men in yellow cloaks, who thus honor one who was of the blood of their chiefs, that can be seen nowhere else. Lastly, the catafalque, decorated with the insignia of a royalty that had an individuality when it lived though it is now dead, surrounded by the feather kahilis that would be gay if they were not the recognized trappings of royal woe, surely it was a picture out of the past that has been dead for so long men have all but forgotten it.

Not now, as in the old days, did naked painted heathen howl around the bier of the dead, making the whole earth a saturnalia for their lawless passions and now and again, when they thought of it, knocking out a tooth or killing one of the common people, by way of showing how they grieved for the dead chief. The mourning, the chanting of the genealogies of the dead, the waving of the kahilis above his bier, the lying in state while the people, white and native, defiled around the coffin laid in a room that is the last possibility in the modernity of its furnishings, all that is decorous now. That much the Hawaiians owe to the influences that have civilized them. The days of the funeral orgy are gone by, and the life of the lowest is safe when the highest dies, though the death of the lineage of Kamehameha of Hawaii. But the resultant mingling of the new with the old, the grafting of the dead march upon the scene, the signs of sober woe upon the faces of a people that were wont to go mad at the coming of death, all had about it something incongruous. It was fitting, and yet not fitting. And the crowd went home from a funeral—and also from a holiday pageant.

Do not mistake me. There was no irreverence in this, no lack of respect for the grim power that will reach out some day and gather us all to itself. High and lowly, we raise our hats to death passing by. The trappings men put upon the destroyer tell other, and various stories. The native crowd went home, sad and sorrowful. Each incident of the day and each part of the pageant had, to them, a meaning symbolic of the end, that is to come to us all—may, to some, it may have carried even a deeper meaning, of the doom that will slowly sweep them, as a race, from the sons of earth. The Americans went home as from a holiday pageant—and sighed a little, perhaps, that the show was so soon over.
